In Still, The Small Voice: Narrative, Personal Revelation and the Mormon Folk Tradition, Tom Mould examines how people transform the intensely personal experience of revelation into stories that can be shared with Mormon and non-Mormon alike. In his Founder’s Day talk, Mould will introduce some of the major patterns and paradoxes of personal revelation stories in order to engage the audience in an exploration of some preliminary comparisons between the personal revelation stories found in and outside the Intermountain West. Tom Mould is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Elon University and director of Elon’s Program for Ethnographic Research and Community Studies. He is the author of Choctaw Prophecy: A Legacy of the Future, Choctaw Tales, and Still, the Small Voice: Narrative, Personal Revelation, and the Mormon Folk Tradition. His research focuses on issues of generic boundaries and constructed identities, particularly in the study of oral narrative.
